Introduction

The Local Government (Scotland) Act of 1994 redrew the map of local government in Scotland replacing the two-tier system of 9 Regions and 53 Districts, which had been in place on the mainland since 1974, with 29 new unitary authorities. Elections for the new authorities were held on 6th April 1995 and those elected are to 'shadow' the old councils for a year before the new system comes into effect. The names of the new local authority areas (to date it has not been decided whether their generic title should be 'districts' 'councils' or whatever) and their relationship to former authorities are as follows.

New Authority	Former Authority/ies
Aberdeen	Aberdeen District
Aberdeenshire	Banff and Buchan District; Gordon District; Kincardine and Deeside District
Angus	Angus District; part of Dundee District
Argyll and Bute	Argyll and Bute District; part of Dumbarton District
East Ayrshire	Kilmarnock and Loudoun District; Cumnock and Doon Valley District
North Ayrshire	Cunninghame District
South Ayrshire	Kyle and Carrick District
Borders	Borders Region
Clackmannan	Clackmannan District
Dumbarton & Clydebank	Clydebank District; part of Dumbarton District
Dumfries & Galloway	Dumfries and Galloway Region
East Dunbartonshire	Bearsden and Milngavie District; part of Strathkelvin District
Dundee	Part of Dundee District
Edinburgh	Edinburgh District
Falkirk	Falkirk District
Fife	Fife Region
Glasgow	Part of Glasgow District
Highland	Highland Region
Inverclyde	Inverclyde District
North Lanarkshire	Cumbernauld and Kilsyth District; Motherwell District; Monklands District; part of Strathkelvin District
South Lanarkshire	Clydesdale District; Hamilton District; East Kilbride District; part of Glasgow District
East Lothian	East Lothian District
Midlothian	Midlothian District
West Lothian	West Lothian District
Moray	Moray District
Perthshire and Kinross	Perth and Kinross District; part of Dundee District
East Renfrewshire	Eastwood District; part of Renfrew District
Renfrewshire	Part of Renfrew District
Stirling	Stirling District

Four of the new authorities are identical to former Regions - Borders, Dumfries and Galloway, Fife and Highland - with their component Districts being abolished; twelve are unaltered former Districts; two are combinations of entire Districts and eleven involve alterations to former District boundaries.

As under the previous system, councillors were to be elected in single-member wards and electoral arrangements for the new authorities - in other words the number, names and boundaries of wards - were, according to the Act, to be determined not by the independent Local Government Boundary Commission but by the Secretary of State. The task was actually delegated to a junior minister in the Scottish Office, Allan

Stewart, and his decisions were published in a series of Directions. In late 1994, however, the Boundary Commission was coming to the end of its second statutory review of District ward boundaries and in almost all cases its proposals were simply applied to the relevant new authorities. There were some exceptions, however. Where District boundaries had been altered the Commission's proposals had to be modified. In some cases - the adjustment of borders between Angus, Dundee and Perth and Kinross, for example - the modifications were slight. In others - the part of Glasgow transferred to South Lanarkshire, for example - the Under-Secretary of State's direction involved defining entirely new wards. Another exception was the Highland authority. In this case it was believed that the Commission's proposals would result in too many councillors for the unitary authority and so proposed wards and polling districts (and in the case of Caithness District - for no obvious reason - unrevised wards) were combined to form the wards for the new authority. In total, it would be fair to say that 94 of the 1161 wards in the new system were defined at the discretion of the Secretary of State and were markedly different from those intended by the Boundary Commission.

This volume continues the series established in 1974 by John Bochel and David Denver and aims, as before, to provide an accessible and authoritative record of the results of Scottish local elections. Given the changed local government system there are some enforced changes in presentation. Authorities are listed in the order used by the Scottish Office. This is broadly alphabetical but the prefixes 'East' 'North' etc. are ignored. Within authorities, wards are listed by number. Women candidates are identified by the prefix 'Ms' and the abbreviations used for the party affiliations of candidates (and the assorted other labels) are as follows:

CD	Christian Democrat	Lib	Liberal
Comm	Communist	LibDem	Liberal Democrat
Con	Conservative	Mod	Moderate
DemLeft	Democratic Left	NLP	Natural Law Party
Green	Green Party	Prog	Progressive
Ind	Independent	ResAss	Residents Association
IndCon	Independent Conservative	RL	Raving Loonies
IndLab	Independent Labour	SML	Scottish Militant Labour
IndSN	Independent Scottish	SNP	Scottish National Party
	Nationalist
Lab	Labour

We should record at this point that the elections in two wards, North Ayrshire ward 14 (Stevenston) and South Lanarkshire ward 15 (Forth) were postponed due to the deaths of a candidate. In addition it should be noted that, most unusually, the election results in two wards were challenged and the elections later declared void. This happened in Falkirk ward 33 (Laurmont East) and in Borders ward 35 (Southdean). The original results are presented in this publication.

We are grateful to John Bochel for gathering and checking much of the material, to Ritchie Denver for assistance with inputting data and to Adrian Coombes who put considerable effort into making further improvements and alterations to the software used for tabulating and analysing the results. Michael Thrasher and Colin Rallings of the Local Government Elections Centre at the University of Plymouth took on the printing of the final document.

Commentary on the Results

To say that in recent years the Conservative Party has been in the doldrums in Scotland is an understatement. For what is supposed to be a major party their performance has been truly pitiful. In the 1992 general election and the District elections which followed immediately afterwards they made a (very) modest recovery from previous low points, obtaining 25.7% and 23.2% of the votes respectively, and might have begun to believe that they were on the way back. But the recovery did not last long and soon new depths of unpopularity were being plumbed. In the Regional elections of 1994 the Conservatives recorded their worst-ever performance with 13.7% of the votes and in the European elections of the same year a month later, when there were no complications arising from uncontested seats or support for Independents in rural areas, they received only 14.5% of the Scottish vote.

In the second half of 1994 and the first few months of 1995, as the table shows, there was no sign that the Tories were moving from this rock-bottom level of support. Indeed, on these figures it would be fair to describe the Conservatives as 'also rans' in Scottish electoral politics with Labour maintaining its long-term dominance and the SNP securely in second place.

Part of the problem for the Conservatives in Scotland is that they are perceived to be an English party, and this is compounded - or perhaps caused - by the fact that the Government appears to be unable to understand and respond to Scottish sensitivities. A clear example of this is the way in which the new structure of local government itself was instituted. In the first place, the system was imposed with little in the way of consultation. In England, the Local Government Commission was empowered to test local opinion, consult interested parties and make recommendations about changes in the local government structure in the shire counties (and in many cases, to the annoyance of the Government, decided to recommend that the existing two-tier structure should not be changed). Scotland, in contrast, was treated rather like a colony, with the metropolitan government simply imposing its wishes by fiat. Moreover, the affront was compounded by the fact that the boundaries of the new authorities appeared to have been drawn to advantage the Conservatives. Despite ministerial denials, it was widely argued that the dismemberment of Strathclyde Region was simply a piece of political vindictiveness and that the purpose of creating unitary authorities such as East Renfrewshire, Stirling and South Ayrshire was to give the Conservatives a chance of retaining a toehold in Scottish local government. The Herald and The Scotsman, influential mouthpieces of middle-class opinion, were outraged. When the Government announced the composition of the new authorities, The Herald (9 July 1993) argued in a hard-hitting editorial that the proposals 'demonstrated the Government's determination to carve up the Labour heartlands... and preserve Conservative enclaves' and that the new structure could have no lasting legitimacy. At the start of the 1995 local election campaign, The Scotsman (15 March 1995) commented: 'Ministers' refusal to establish an independent commission to draw up the new boundaries was a piece of arrogance for which there was no respectable case to make, and none ever made'.

Two other incidents - not directly the fault of the Conservatives - upset a much broader spectrum of Scottish opinion in the run-up to the elections. The first was the announcement by BR early in the year that the London to Fort William sleeper was to be discontinued. Despite the fact that most Scots would never use this line, and probably most had never heard of it, the proposed closure was interpreted to be a consequence of the unpopular Conservative policy of privatising the railways and yet another slight on Scotland. The second incident was the furore over the decision of the BBC to broadcast a lengthy interview with the Prime Minister on the Monday before the elections. This appeared to contradict normal practice and the requirement for partisan balance in broadcasting. It would almost certainly not have been considered in the week of the English local elections and the opposition parties obtained a court injunction preventing the broadcast in Scotland. Yet again, with some justification, Scots could feel aggrieved. The London-based media, it appeared, were either simply ignorant of the looming elections in Scotland or else did not consider them important enough to apply the usual rules relating to political broadcasting.

There was little doubt, then, that the Conservatives were in for a drubbing in the elections to the new authorities, but few anticipated just how severe the drubbing turned out to be. Before considering the performances of the parties, however, we follow the pattern established in previous reports by examining candidatures, contests and turnout, making comparisons with the last rounds of District and Regional elections.

Candidates and Contests

There were good grounds for thinking that the new structure of local government would result in a decline in the number of people participating as candidates. The number of seats available (1161) was significantly smaller than the combined total under the old system (1611). Nonetheless, there were more candidates for the new authorities than there had ever been in a single round of elections under the old system. As table A shows, this was largely a consequence of the extensive presence of Labour and the SNP.

Others	126	67	110

Labour contested 80.5% of all wards, including every ward in 17 authorities and made inroads (in terms of candidatures at least) into areas that were formerly characterised by non-partisan local politics. Thus, they fought 31 of the 70 wards in Dumfries and Galloway and 18 of the 72 in Highland. It is only in the latter, Borders (4 out of 58), Argyll and Bute (11 out of 33) and Moray (8 out of 18) that Labour contested a relatively small proportion of wards. The SNP performance in this respect was even more impressive. They contested almost 86% of wards, reaching 100% in 15 authorities and falling below 50% of seats contested in just two - Argyll and Bute and Dumfries and Galloway. The Liberal Democrats, like Labour and the SNP, fielded a record number of candidates but, indicative of a drop in morale, the Conservatives contested just over half of the seats (50.5%) and had fewer candidates than they had in both the 1992 and 1988 District elections.

A direct consequence of the large number of party candidates was that only 4.5% of wards were uncontested (excluding the two where the election was postponed) as compared with 13.1% of District wards in 1992 and 6.4% of Regional divisions in 1994. Moreover, 92% of the genuinely uncontested seats were concentrated in just four authorities (Argyll & Bute, Borders, Dumfries and Galloway and Highland). It seems likely, especially if the parties continue to put forward a large number of candidates, that very few wards will go uncontested in future - but it is also likely that the very high proportion of contests on this occasion partly reflects a flurry of interest raised by the institution of the new system. Given that there were more old councillors than there are new seats, competition for seats on the new authorities was bound to be greater than normal.

One of the unmistakable trends in Scottish local elections from 1974 to 1994 was a steady increase in the number of women candidates and councillors. As table B shows, by 1992 women comprised over a quarter of candidates and more than a fifth of councillors at District level. Despite the increased competition for seats caused by the abolition of major Regions - where women were less well-represented - the proportion of women candidates in 1995 was almost as large as it was at the last District elections (itself a record high) and the proportion of women councillors (22.9%) is the largest ever.

Turnout

Scottish voters could be forgiven if they were suffering from 'election fatigue' by the Spring of 1995. The general election in 1992 was quickly followed by the District elections. These were followed in 1994 by the Regional and European elections and then in 1995 came the elections for the new local authorities. In table C the turnout figure for each of these is given.

Table C: Turnout in Scottish-wide Elections 1992-1995 (%)

General Election 1992	District Elections 1992	Regional Elections 1994	European Election 1994	Council Elections 1995
75.4	41.4	45.6	37.9	44.9

Clearly elections other than general elections are regarded by the voters as 'second order' elections, but turnout in 1995 was greater than in the European elections of the previous year and was close to what has come to be normal for Scottish local elections. There was, of course, considerable variation in turnout at local authority and, even more so, at ward level. Three authorities had turnouts below 40% - Aberdeen (38.1%), Glasgow (38.2%) and Aberdeenshire (39.7%). On the other hand, the highest turnouts were recorded in South Ayrshire (54.6%), Stirling (53.4%), East Ayrshire (52.5%), East Dunbartonshire (51.7%) and Perthshire and Kinross (51.2%). In the last case turnout was probably boosted by the activity and publicity surrounding the impending parliamentary by-election, but the other four high-turnout areas were thought in advance of the elections to be marginal authorities.

Party Support

The distribution of votes in the 1995 local elections, compared with the last rounds of District and Regional elections is shown in table D. Clearly, the Conservative performance was abysmal - their worst ever in Scotland and well below the 30.3% of the vote that they achieved in the Regional elections of 1978. In a whole string of authorities across central Scotland their vote share was well under 10% and the largest share they managed - in East Renfrewshire - was only 29.2%. On the other hand, the 43.8% share of the vote obtained by Tony Blair's much vaunted 'new' Labour, while solid enough, was still smaller than the Labour share in the District elections of 1980 (45.4%) and 1984 (45.7%). Nonetheless, Labour topped 50% of the vote in 12 authorities and obtained 62.3% in North Lanarkshire and 61.5% in Glasgow. The Liberal Democrat overall vote share was very much in line with their average performance in recent local elections but more than the other parties the overall figure is slightly misleading. There are numerous authorities where the Liberal Democrats are very weak or even non-existent - in 12 they gained less than 5% of the vote - while in some they are a significant force - they gained more than 20% of the votes in Aberdeen, Aberdeenshire, Borders, Fife and Inverclyde. The overall SNP share was broadly in line with the preceding opinion polls and the figures in the table suggest that SNP support in the 1990s has stabilised at around a quarter of the Scottish electorate.

Table D: Share of Votes in Local Elections 1992-1995 (%)

	District Elections 1992	Regional Elections 1994	Council Elections 1995
Con	23.2	13.7	11.3
Lab	34.1	41.8	43.8
Lib Dem	9.5	11.9	9.7
SNP	24.3	26.8	26.2
Ind	7.4	4.2	7.6
Others	1.9	1.1	1.5

Overall shares of the vote in local elections are, of course, affected by the number of candidates put forward by the parties and hence may be to some extent misleading indicators of party popularity. If there is no party candidate in a ward no votes for the party can be cast. In past reports we have sought to minimise this problem by isolating wards and electoral divisions in which at there were candidates for all four parties in successive elections. This enabled us to make more accurate assessments of trends in party support. In this case, however, given the new authorities and the new wards, there are no directly comparable wards from a previous election. For the record, however, and for comparison with the next round of elections in 1999, there were 281 wards in which all four parties had candidates. Given the relatively small number of Conservative candidates these wards are concentrated in areas of relative Conservative strength and the four-party shares of the vote were Labour 39.2%, Conservative 20.9%, SNP 20.5% and Liberal Democrat 19.3%.

The immediate impact of local election results does not usually derive from analysis of the voting figures but from the rather starker totals of council seats and councils won and lost. Table E shows the number of seats won by each of the parties in the 1995 elections as compared with the last elections under the old system.

Because of the way in which the simple plurality electoral system works the Conservatives won only 82 seats in the whole of Scotland - down from a total of 235 under the old system. They won none at all (out of 92) in Fife and in five other smaller authorities, and reached double figures only in Edinburgh (14 out of 58). Labour, in contrast, reaped a handsome reward. Under the old system they held 43% of all seats but in 1995 they won more than all other parties and categories combined (53%). The effect of the concentration of Liberal Democrat support was such that with 9.7% of the votes they won 10.4% of the seats while the even spread of SNP votes meant that they took 15.6% of the seats despite having 26.2% of votes.

Labour's dominance of Scottish local government is clear. They control 20 authorities comprising 76.5% of the Scottish electorate. As we suggested in our report on the last Regional elections, it is doubtful whether any change to the structure of local government in Scotland would make any difference to this. No matter how the boundaries are drawn the great majority of the population will continue to be governed by Labour at local level. In that sense any Conservative attempt to gerrymander boundaries to their own advantage was doomed to failure. But even if the aim was simply to secure a few islands of Conservative strength in the middle of the Labour sea then that too failed. The Conservatives now control no local authority in Scotland, failing to win a majority even in affluent East Renfrewshire, which had the largest Conservative majority in Scotland at the 1992 general election. The restructuring of authorities has robbed the Liberal Democrats of the councils that they controlled (North East Fife and Annandale and Eskdale) or could realistically hope to gain (Gordon) and they are not in a position to be optimistic about gaining control of any of the new authorities. The SNP have been luckier and won control of three small authorities.

The abject failure of the Conservatives in these elections could be dismissed as a short-term effect of extreme government unpopularity and this, no doubt, played a part. But there has been a long-term decline in the number of Conservative councillors in Scotland. Table F shows that they had more than a quarter of all councillors in 1978 but now have only 7%. Moreover, having such a small number of councillors may have serious implications for the future viability of the Conservatives as a serious force in Scottish politics.

Table F: Conservative % Share of All Scottish Councillors 1978-95

1978	1982	1986	1990	1994	1995
26.7	22.2	15.9	13.4	14.6	7.1

Local councillors form a key group of party activists. They have a clear personal interest in ensuring that the local party stays healthy so that it can campaign effectively when the time comes to defend their seats. They are likely to be more active than others in recruiting new members and volunteer workers in elections. In addition, councillors form a pool of experienced local politicians from which parliamentary candidates can be recruited (the Prime Minister himself being an example). Having an important presence on the local council is important to local parties in another way. The chance to become a councillor or, for the less ambitious, to influence or get inside information about council policy through party activity, is an important incentive for joining and becoming active in a party. Where the party has little prospect of winning council seats the incentive to join and become active is correspondingly reduced. If a party has hardly any members on the council there seems little point in attending party meetings to discuss local political issues.

Local elections come round much more frequently than general elections and they provide a political (as opposed to social) focus for party activity. From a purely instrumental point of view, they allow the party to keep its election machine in shape by giving volunteers a chance to gain experience in the arts and mechanics of campaigning and by updating canvass records. Where a party does not seriously contest local elections this is lost and, perhaps even more importantly, electors may simply get out of the habit of voting for the party.

Bad results in local elections can, then, have a deleterious cumulative effect on a party's fortunes in both local government and parliamentary terms. In terms of Conservative organisational effectiveness, the effects of the 1995 results could continue to be felt for years to come.

Good results in local elections have the opposite effect - an increase in the number of councillors will bring organisational benefits to a party - and this is also illustrated in the election results. Most obviously the long run of Labour success at local level now sees them in total command of the central belt. In addition, however, both the SNP and the Liberal Democrats built on past successes and did well where they have steadily increased their local presence during the 1980s. Thus the SNP won control of Angus, Moray and Perth and Kinross and now hold the parliamentary seats in all three. Although they did not win any councils, the Liberal Democrats won 17 of the 18 wards in the North East Fife constituency where they gradually advanced in council elections during the 1980s and won the parliamentary seat in the 1987 general election.

The Conservatives, then, have been in decline in Scotland for some considerable time and the outlook for them remains bleak. Even so, the 1995 elections saw a significant further slump in support and in the aftermath of the elections the Conservatives sought for explanations. Michael Forsyth, now Secretary of State for Scotland, complained that the results were simply 'unfair' and Michael Hirst, Scottish Conservative chairman, said on television that they showed that Scottish voters were 'ungrateful' but the most common excuses put forward were that the party was failing to get its message across effectively enough and that divisions and squabbling within the party at Westminster were making it temporarily unpopular. This seems to reflect a refusal to face reality. On the Saturday after the elections the editorial of The Herald was much closer to the truth:

The vast majority of that large proportion of the Scottish electorate which voted for any party other than [the Conservatives] do not give tuppence for Tory divisions... What message is it that we have missed? The simple truth is that the Tories are electorally lost because the public understands their policies only too well... For the sake of sanity it is necessary to adapt a Democratic slogan from the last presidential election in the United States. For the Tories this morning it should read, 'It's the policies, stupid'.

Forms of Local Politics

In their series of reports on local elections in Scotland under the previous structure, John Bochel and David Denver categorised local authorities as being characterised by 'partisan', 'non-partisan' or 'mixed' between the two in their form of local politics. In partisan areas local politics is dominated by the major parties while in non-partisan areas party candidates are rare and Independents predominate. Using this categorisation Bochel and Denver were able to trace a gradual extension of partisan politics at local level over the years, and the distinction also proved useful for various other types of analysis. As we have already seen, the parties - especially Labour and the SNP - took the opportunity afforded by the institution of a new structure to extend their participation in local elections into new areas and the effect is that none of the new authorities can be described as purely non-partisan. Indeed, with the exception of five authorities - Aberdeenshire, Argyll and Bute, Borders, Dumfries and Galloway, and Highland - Scottish local politics is clearly organised on a partisan basis. Contrasts between these five authorities, which have a 'mixed' form of local politics, and the partisan areas are shown in table G.

Table G: Comparisons Between Partisan and 'Mixed' Authorities

	Partisan Authorities	Mixed Authorities
% of electorate	84.6	15.4
% wards contested	99.7	82.5
% turnout	44.9	44.5
% candidates Ind	3.0	39.2
% votes Ind	2.0	43.1
% seats Ind	1.5	51.6
% Votes
Con	11.7	8.6
Lab	48.8	11.4
Lib Dem	8.8	15.5
SNP	27.0	20.9

As can be seen, partisan authorities now contain almost 85% of the Scottish electorate. The slow extension of partisan local politics is shown by the fact that after the 1977 District elections, when the categorisation was first used, partisan districts covered 76.7% of the electorate. Almost all wards in partisan areas were contested, not unexpectedly, and the number of Independent candidates, the votes they received and seats they won were very small. Labour received almost half of the vote in these areas. The fact that the other areas are clearly 'mixed', rather than non-partisan, is shown by the fact that well under half of the candidates were Independents. They received under half of the votes and won just over half of the seats. The SNP, with 20% of the vote, and possibly the Liberal Democrats, seem best placed to make advances in these areas. The difference in turnout between the two sorts of authorities was not significant.

Finally, we consider the pattern of party competition in individual wards in partisan authorities. Between 1974 and 1994, under the old local government structure, party competition in this sense became markedly more intense. In 1974, at both Regional and District level, straight fights between two parties comprised about two-thirds of all party contests (with Conservative v Labour contests being the most frequent of all) and four-way contests were rare. By the last rounds of elections, 23% of District wards (1992) and 60% of Regional electoral divisions in partisan areas (1994) had four-party contests. Two-way contests had sharply reduced in frequency and straight fights between the Conservatives and Labour had almost disappeared.

Table H shows the pattern of party contests in wards in the 24 partisan authorities in 1995. Almost a third of all wards had four party contests and almost 40% had three-way contests, most of the latter involving the Conservatives, Labour and the SNP. Only one form of two-way contest is significant (Labour v SNP) in these wards, being found in just over a quarter of them.

Table H: The Nature of Party Contests in Partisan Authorities

Four-Way Contests	%
Con v Lab v Lib Dem v SNP	30.6
<hr/>
Three-Way Contests
Con v Lab v SNP	23.2
Lab v Lib Dem v SNP	12.6
Other	2.4
All Three-Way	38.2
<hr/>
Two-Way Contests
Lab v SNP	26.1
Other	3.4
All Two-Way	29.5

Note: Percentages are of the number of wards in partisan authorities less the two where the election was postponed (N=879). The figures do not total 100 since they omit uncontested seats and those which did not have a major-party contest.

There is little doubt, then, that under the new local government structure electoral politics at local level in Scotland will continue to be more complicated than it used to be. Labour is certainly dominant in the partisan authorities but competition for seats remains healthy. Partisan politics at local level has some detractors, but the experience of Scottish local elections is that it is more effective than a non-partisan system in ensuring that seats are contested and that the electorate are offered some choice in local government. It is to be hoped, therefore, that the parties will continue to think that local government is important enough to warrant contesting as many wards as possible.
