The Local Government (Scotland) Act 1973 introduced major changes in the system of local government in Scotland. These changes are so fundamental that they mark the beginning of a new era of local government and coincide with other important contemporary and prospective developments in the politics of Scotland.

The time is appropriate to set about recording and preserving the results of local elections in Scotland in a systematic and comprehensive manner. Elections are a key feature of liberal-democratic political systems, and the availability of reliable data is essential for their proper study.

This is the first comprehensive compilation and analysis of local election results in Scotland or indeed in Britain. It is always a tiresome and frustrating business to try to find out detailed results from the past, and this volume fills an important gap. This work goes further than merely reporting the results, and detailed analysis is produced in the form of summary tables with comments upon some of the more important features of the results. There are twelve such tables with comments on the Regional results, fifteen on District results and tables on the Islands Areas. The tables deal with such matters as sizes of electorates, number of contested electoral divisions, party candidacies, turnout, rejected ballots, numbers of candidates, numbers of women candidates and councillors, party votes, and seats won.

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

We wish to thank the Social Science Research Council for a grant which covered the cost of the collection and analysis of data contained in this book. Anyone working on a project such as this inevitably incurs debts to a number of people. We should like to thank the Returning Officers and their staffs for their essential co-operation in sending us detailed results from the many election contests; Mr. W.L. Lamberton of the Scottish Development Department for help in a variety of directions; Miss J. Townson, Mrs. B. Denver and Miss D. Tindal for their indispensable secretarial help; Mrs. V. Baker, Mr. W. Ballantyne, Miss R. Goulstone and Hugh, Janet and Margaret Bochel for general research assistance. INTRODUCTION

I

The Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1973, introduced major changes in the system of local government in Scotland. The 4 Counties of Cities, 21 Large Burghs, 176 Small Burghs, 33 Counties and 196 Districts of County which together constituted the old system, were replaced by a two-tier structure of Districts and Regions over almost the whole country. Nine Regional authorities were created, and these were in turn divided into a total of 53 Districts. The exception to this pattern is the outlying islands, for which three single-tier Islands Authorities were instituted.

These structural changes, along with a redistribution of functions, are so fundamental as to mark the beginning of a new era of local government in Scotland. This is an appropriate time, then, to set about recording and preserving the results of local elections in Scotland in a systematic and comprehensive manner. We think it important for a number of reasons that such a task be undertaken, but the principal justification is quite simply that elections are a key feature of liberal-democratic political systems and are therefore deserving of study. Local elections have a central role in local political systems and are an essential element of any account of the workings of local democracy.

There has not been in the past any comprehensive compilation of local election results in Scotland. If our own experience is typical, scholars or others attempting to find out detailed results from even a few years back would have found the task frustrating. Perhaps surprisingly, no department of the Scottish Office is charged with responsibility for collecting election results. Returning Officers are required to send to the Registrar-General for Scotland notification of the size of the electorate, the number of contested elections and the number of ballots cast in the authority for which they are responsible. These data are subsequently published in the Registrar-General's Annual Report. But this seems to be the total of official concern with local election data. Many local authorities systematically destroy their election records after the lapse of a few years.

Scottish daily newspapers do a useful and rapid job in reporting, between them, most local government election results, but these are inevitably incomplete and occasionally inaccurate. A complete set of local newspapers would undoubtedly go a long way towards providing most of the data that might be desired, but here again, minor inaccuracies and inconsistent treatment make them something less than a fully reliable source. For example, many newspaper reports of results do not give the number of electors in a division or ward and they rarely give the numbers of rejected ballot papers. These are important and interesting pieces of data, and are essential for accurate calculations of turnout.

This volume will fill a gap. It has, we think, two major uses. Firstly, it is a straightforward presentation of information not readily available, but frequently sought after by a wide audience including council officials, civil servants, candidates and councillors, journalists, people active in political parties, students and teachers. Secondly, we see this book as an easily accessible source of data for further research. On its own, or in combination with other sources of aggregate data, the volume can be used by academics and other commentators wishing to undertake more complex analyses than those attempted here. Our main concern has been to compile the results and construct some of the more important summary tables based on them. We have not undertaken any more sophisticated analysis since it seems to us more important that the data we have gathered should be disseminated as quickly as possible so that others may use the information as they wish. This volume may be modest in scope, but our view is that it provides a rich mine of data for further analysis.

As we noted above, it is far from a universal practice for local authorities to assign such material as election returns to well-indexed archives. We have here, in some measure, performed this exercise for them.

II

The first elections to the new local authorities in Scotland were held on 7 May 1974. For electoral purposes each new District was divided into single-member wards, and wards were combined to form single-member electoral divisions for the Regional authorities. The Islands areas, not having a two-tier system, were divided into single-member electoral divisions only. Since elections for all authorities were held on the same day, electors (except those in the Islands areas) had two votes — one for a District councillor and one for a Regional councillor.

This situation, which some commentators believed would confuse the electorate, will not be repeated. The term of office for all councillors will be four years, and elections will be held every second year, with District and Regional (and Islands) Council elections alternating. Various small adjustments have had to be made in order to establish this pattern. The effect of these is that the next District elections will be held in 1977, Regional and Islands elections will be held in 1978, District elections will come round again in 1980 and thereafter the two-yearly cycle of elections and the four year term for councillors will operate normally. The new councils elected in May 1974 assumed power on 16 May 1975.

III

The sources and methods used in compiling this collection are as follows. Figures for electorates were obtained in advance from electoral registration officers. Sometimes these figures differed slightly from those given later by Returning Officers, in which cases the latter's figures were preferred. Some Returning Officers excluded from the total all those whose eighteenth birthday fell after polling day; others did not, and it is possible that our figures for electorates may differ from those in other published sources.

A provisional listing of the election results was made from four Scottish daily newspapers viz. The Glasgow Herald, The Scotsman, The Press and Journal (Aberdeen) and The Courier and Advertiser (Dundee). Since these did not cover all the contests it was necessary to make use of some local weekly papers. It was necessary to refer to newspapers despite their limitations, because they almost always give the party affiliations of candidates. A considerable number of Returning Officers still do not indicate candidates' descriptions on their official notification of the election results.

Every Returning Officer in Scotland was asked to send us a complete set of results, and our provisional listing was checked against these. In the event of any discrepancy between a newspaper and a Returning Officer's report, the latter was adopted.

The collection of results from Returning Officers was not as straightforward as might be imagined. The majority provided the data requested within a few weeks of the elections, but in a number of cases our initial letter requesting their help was lost; in some cases pressure of work resulted in a quite lengthy delay, and in a handful of cases we faced a positive unwillingness to co-operate. The fact that we now have a complete set of returns says as much about our importunities as it does about the co-operativeness of the Returning Officers.

IV

The individual ward or electoral division results are presented here in a standard form. Each ward or division is identified by number and, where applicable, by name.*

* The numbering of wards and divisions is mandatory. Names are given at the discretion of local authorities.

The electorate for each ward immediately follows its number and name. Below this is given the name and description of each candidate, the number of votes each received and the percentage share of the vote that this represented. Women candidates are identified by their full forenames. One of the few pieces of information which we do not include is the number of rejected ballot papers in each ward or division. Reasons of space and clarity of presentation suggested that on balance, it was better to exclude these data. Candidates' descriptions are usually, but not always, the descriptions the candidates give of themselves on their nomination papers. We have standardized the description of major party candidates; we describe as 'Independent' not only those who put that on their nomination papers, but also those who used a similar description such as 'Non-Political' or 'Border Independent'. In addition we categorize as 'Independent' those who gave no description at all. Similarly, our description of 'Independent Labour' applies to people describing themselves as 'Real Labour', 'True Labour', and so on.

The abbreviations used are as follows:

AAD	Advocate of All-in Democracy	Lab	Labour
CDS	Christian Democrat Socialist	Lib	Liberal
Con	Conservative	Mod	Moderate
Comm	Communist	PLP	Paisley Local Party
CA	Community Association	Prog	Progressive
DSLP	Democratic Socialist Labour Party	Prog/Con	Progressive Conservative
Ind Con	Independent Conservative	RA	Ratepayers Association
Ind	Independent	Res A	Residents Association
Ind Lab	Independent Labour	SNP	Scottish National Party
Ind Nat	Independent Nationalist	SWRP	Scottish Workers Republican Party
Ind Prog	Independent Progressive	TA	Tenants Association
Ind Soc	Independent Socialist

The final items given in each result are the winning candidate's majority and the percentage turnout. It should be noted that the figure for turnout is based on the number of ballots cast and therefore takes account of the number of spoilt ballots, which is not shown here, as well as the votes recorded for each candidate.

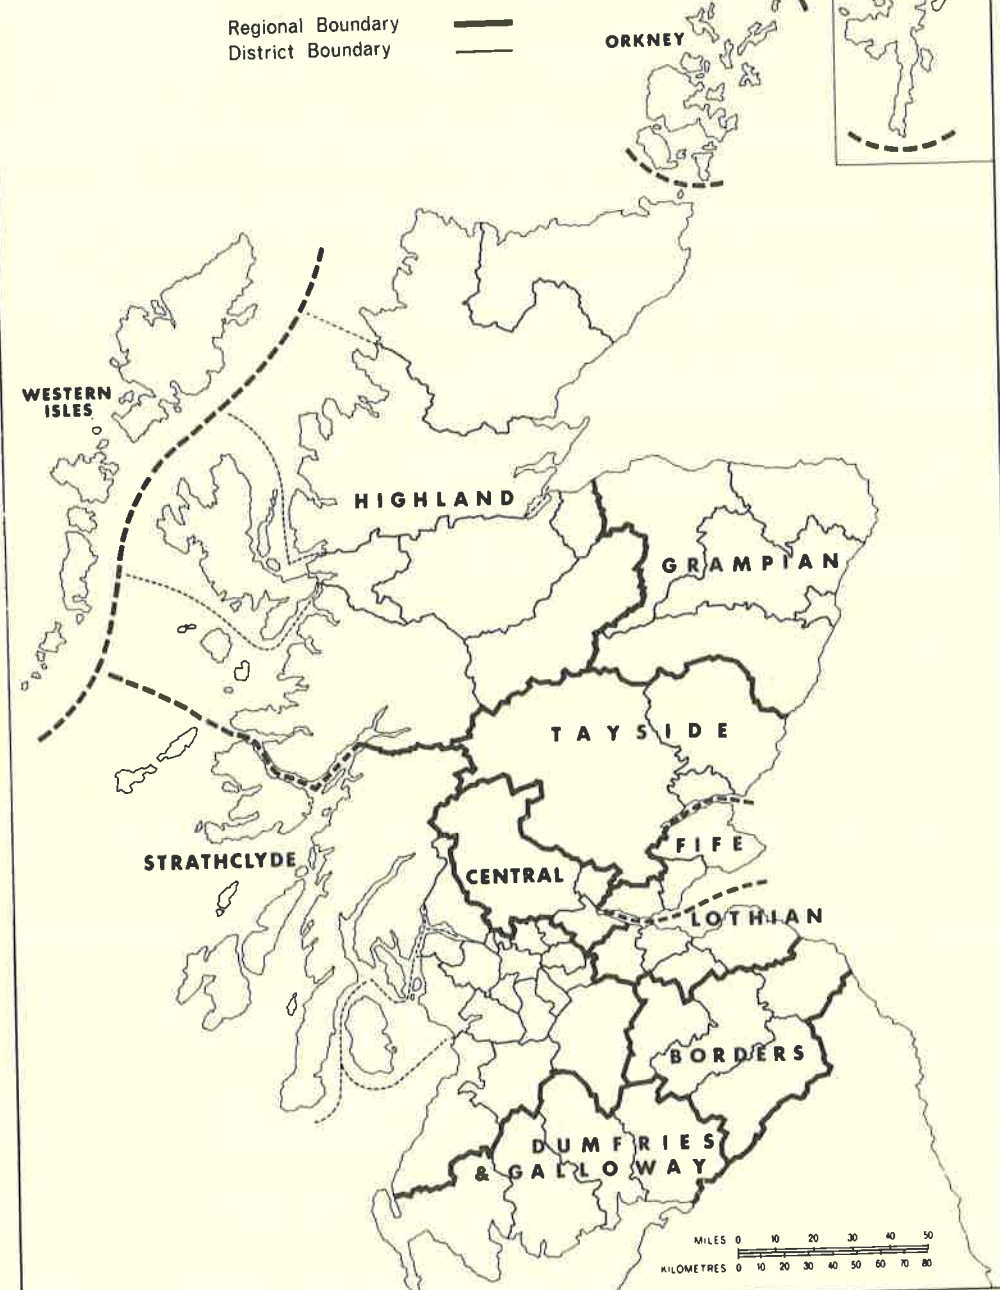

The overall layout of the material is as follows. First are given the results of the elections for the nine Regions and the three Islands Areas. There then follow the results for each of the fifty-three Districts arranged in Regions. The third section consists of a selection of summary tables with brief comments upon them. Lastly there is an appendix showing how district wards were combined to form Regional electoral divisions. We should have liked to have constructed an appendix describing the new electoral divisions and wards in relation to the old, or in some other way. The amount of space required to do so, and the problem of giving descriptions which would have much meaning for those not acquainted with an area, made us decide against it.

Since the first elections for the new authorities a few of the Districts have changed their names, but we have not incorporated the changes in this publication.

The material presented here has been checked several times. With so many contests to be covered however, it would be surprising if some errors do not still remain. In addition to errors for which we may be responsible, we are aware of some minor inaccuracies outside our control. In a few cases for instance, the sums of the electorates in the District wards do not tally with the electorates in Regional electoral divisions. While inaccuracies of this kind, and simple human errors on our part and on the part of those who have helped with this project are regrettable, we think that they are not of material importance for any of the uses of these data which we can envisage.

SUMMARY TABLES

In this section we present a series of tables which summarize some aspects of the election results. It would, of course, be possible to produce very many more tables than are given here. Indeed, the possibilities for making various combinations and permutations of the results are limitless. We have, however, selected tables which seem to us to be particularly important and/or especially interesting, but because the individual ward and electoral division results are comprehensively documented in previous sections, readers will be able to construct further summaries to fit their own purposes.

Attached to each table are a few notes and comments. These offer some guidance in interpretation of the data. The comments made are, however, necessarily brief and we are conscious of the fact that interpretations other than those offered are possible.

Some compression of the data is, of course, necessary for summary tables and for this reason all candidates who are not described in the detailed results as 'Con', 'Lab', 'Lib', 'Comm' or 'SNP' are grouped under 'Others' in the tables. There is one small exception to this in that candidates in the Dundee area who are described as 'Progressive Conservative' are here counted simply as Conservative candidates.

TOTAL	3,654,524	3,416,317	6.5

This table shows how great is the range of electorates amongst the nine Regions. The largest Region, Strathclyde, has an electorate more than twenty times as large as the smallest, Borders, and more than three times as large as the second biggest, the Lothian Region. These variations in size have obvious administrative implications, but there are also direct political effects. For example, a councillor in the Highland region represents on average about 2,700 electors while at the other extreme a Strathclyde Regional Councillor represents about 17,200 electors.

The final column of the table shows the percentage of electors who were disfranchised, as it were, by the fact that there was no contest in their electoral division. Generally this is fairly low, with the exception of Dumfries and Galloway where more than one-third of electors could not vote in the Regional elections for this reason. In contrast only 3% of Strathclyde electors lived in divisions which were not contested.

Dumfries & Galloway	35	23	65.7
TOTAL	432	390	90.3

As implied by the figures in column three of Table 1, the proportion of divisions contested in the Regional Elections was, generally speaking, very large. The greatest proportion of uncontested seats was in the Dumfries and Galloway Region where there were relatively few party candidates (see Tables 3 and 7). It is noteworthy that in Strathclyde, where there are 103 divisions, only three went uncontested.

Overall, these figures compare very favourably with similar figures for recent local government elections in Scotland. In 1972, when only seats in the burghs were at stake, 62% of seats in Scotland were contested and in 1970 when the rural areas also had elections, only 50.3% of all seats were contested. The improvement in the proportion of seats contested under the new system is almost certainly due to the increased electoral commitment of the political parties, and we would expect that most of the improvement will be maintained in future elections.

This table makes clear the point we made previously — that the improvement in the proportion of contested seats is mainly due to the increased activity of the political parties. The bottom row of the table shows that the Labour Party contested just over 70% of all Regional seats, the Conservatives almost 60%, the SNP almost 30% and the Liberals almost 20%. There were, in fact, only 80 seats (18.5%) in which there was not either a Labour or a Conservative candidate, almost all of these being in the Highland, Borders and Dumfries and Galloway Regions. Only 49 seats (11.3%) did not have a candidate from one of the four major parties.

The proportion of seats contested by the different parties varies somewhat from area to area. This reflects only in part the relative strengths of the parties in the different areas. It also reflects, to some extent, a reluctance by local party organisations to bring 'politics' (by which is meant 'party politics') into local government. This explains the very small number of Conservative candidates in the Highland, Borders and Dumfries and Galloway Regions. It remains to be seen whether the Conservatives will be content in future elections to have Labour, Liberal and SNP candidates opposed by Independents or whether they will feel obliged to put forward candidates with their own party label.

There were, in all, 42 divisions uncontested in the Regional elections. Of these, Independents took 17 — mostly from two Regions — Labour 15, the Conservatives 9 and the Liberals 1. It is quite important to remember when looking at Table 10, which shows the total votes gained by the parties, that the totals given there for each party are made lower by the fact that some of the parties' candidates were unopposed. Thus we would expect that the 9 Conservatives who were unopposed would have received substantial votes if there had been a contest and similarly with the 15 unopposed Labour candidates.

The point we are making can be clearly illustrated by considering the results of the District elections in the Cumnock and Doon Valley District (see District elections table 13(h)). In the two seats contested in this District Labour received much less than half of the votes cast, yet 8 other Labour candidates were returned without a contest. If even some of these 8 seats had been contested, then Labour's total vote in the District and its share of the vote, would certainly have been much greater.

This table shows the overall turnout in contested Divisions for each Region, and for all the Regional elections taken together. There were fears that these elections might suffer from low turnout, following shortly as they did after the general election of February 1974. It was also thought that there was an absence of interest in the new system. However, most local authorities mounted fairly extensive publicity campaigns, and radio and television presented informative programmes. These, together with the increased participation of the political parties, made the 1974 elections the most publicised in recent years. The effect was that over the country as a whole, turnout in Regional elections was over 50%. This is considerably higher than turnout at Scottish local elections in recent years. In the three years, 1970, 1971 and 1972, turnout was 44.1%, 42.6% and 42.4% respectively. It is however, difficult to know whether this higher rate of participation by electors will be maintained in future elections.

TOTAL	16,697	0.97

Here we present the numbers of rejected ballot papers, and this number as a percentage of the total votes cast. Ballot papers may be rejected by the Returning Officer for any one of four main reasons. (i) Want of official mark — Occasionally polling clerks forget to stamp the ballot paper before handing it to the elector. (ii) Voting for more candidates than the voter is entitled to. (iii) Writing or mark by which the voter could be identified and (iv) Unmarked or declared void for uncertainty. It might have been expected that having the chance to vote for candidates in two elections at the same time would lead to some confusion among electors, and would result in a larger proportion of spoilt ballots than is usual. We have no comparative figures from previous elections, but it seems to us that the proportion of rejected ballots in these Regional elections was not unduly large.

This table shows the total number of candidates who contested the elections. The figures given in the first five columns are the same as those given in Table 3. That is to say the number of candidates each put forward is the same as the number of divisions each contested. This is not the case, however, with Independent and 'Other' candidates. There were 297 Independent candidates but they contested only 180 seats. In these seats there was frequently more than one Independent candidate. For this reason amongst others the Independents cannot be regarded as a 'party' nor can their vote totals be interpreted in the same way as the votes for party candidates.

A question frequently asked by political scientists and others is, "How representative of the electorate are candidates and councillors?" This table and the next answer this with regard to the sex of candidates and councillors. By comparing the figures given here with those given in Table 7 for all candidates it can be seen that only a small minority of Regional election candidates were women (12.1%). The lowest proportion was in Tayside (5.7%) and the highest in Central (16.9%). Comparing the different parties, the SNP had the highest proportion of women candidates (19.8%) followed by the Liberals (16.8%), the Conservatives (15.4%), Labour (9.9%) and the Communists (5.4%).

This table follows on from the last and shows the numbers of women elected. In all, only 44 women won Regional Council seats — just over 10% of the seats available. As the last two rows of the table show, women candidates were generally less successful in winning seats than men. In the two major parties in particular, women seem to have been chosen for less promising seats than men. The SNP provides a contrary example. Six of the SNP's 25 women candidates were elected (24.0%) compared with 12 of their 101 male candidates (11.9%).

This table must be interpreted with some caution. Firstly, the number of votes which a party receives depends to a considerable extent upon the number of candidates which it puts forward and we have seen for instance that hardly any Conservatives stood in the Highland, Borders and Dumfries and Galloway Regions. In addition, the SNP contested relatively few divisions in some areas. Secondly, as we noted with reference to Table 4, a party must be opposed before it can receive any votes so that the number of uncontested divisions and the winning party in these, have to be borne in mind. Finally, it needs to be noted that the totals given for Independents are derived from situations in which Independent candidates opposed one another, as well as from contests in which Independents opposed major party candidates.

When all this is said, however, it is still clear from the table that in terms of total votes Labour emerged as by far the largest party in Scotland, with the Conservatives coming some way behind. Even if account is taken of the varying numbers of candidates for each party by calculating the average number of votes per candidate in contested divisions, Labour still remains the leading party (2,285 votes) with the Conservatives second (1,996) and the SNP third (1,710 votes).

One of the most interesting questions about future elections will be whether the Independent votes remain as strong or whether the electors will prefer to vote for party candidates. This will be especially interesting in those areas in which the Conservatives this time made relatively little effort, leaving Independents a more or less free run.

The percentages given here are derived from the data presented in Table 10. No party gained a clear majority of the votes in any of the Regions, though Independents were overwhelmingly supported in the Highland and Dumfries and Galloway Regions, and gained a majority of votes in the Borders. In the other six Regions, Labour had the largest share of the votes in Fife, Lothian, Central and Strathclyde, and the Conservatives the largest share in Grampian and Tayside. The SNP's best performance was in the Central Region, though here they may have been aided by the fact that there were relatively few Conservatives or Independent candidates. Otherwise their best performances were in the Strathclyde and Lothian Regions.

In some ways, it is not the number of votes gained that matters, but the number of seats won. Table 12 shows that Labour won most seats in Scotland. They won a majority of seats in Strathclyde and Fife, and are the largest single party in the Lothian and Central Regions. The Conservatives won a majority of seats in the Grampian Region and are the largest single party in Tayside. In the other three Regions, Independents predominate.

The electorate given here for the Strathclyde region differs slightly from the figures given in the first table referring to the Regional elections, for reasons which we mentioned in the Introduction.

The most interesting feature of this table is the material given in the third column which shows the proportions of electors who could not cast a vote in the District elections since there was no contest in their wards. In every case the figure is larger than that for the Regional elections and it is striking that in three Regions — Highland, Borders and Dumfries and Galloway — over half of the electorate was disfranchised in this way. As we have pointed out before, these are the Regions in which the challenge of the political parties was weakest. This illustrates the importance of political parties in recruiting candidates to fight local elections.

It is perhaps more appropriate to compare the proportion of seats contested under the previous local government system with the District elections of 1974, rather than with the Regional elections. The former, being lower tier units, are more akin to the old burghs and districts of county than the latter. The comparison still shows a marked improvement, however, from 50.3% of seats contested in 1970 to 79.5% contested this time.

Finding candidates for all of these seats must have put a great strain upon the personnel and resources of the political parties. If, however, they can maintain their level of activity and perhaps even extend it more generally into the Highland, Borders and Dumfries and Galloway Regions then there seems no reason why this healthy improvement in contested seats cannot be maintained.

It can be seen from the bottom row of this table that the Labour Party contested over two-thirds of all wards in Scotland. No other party contested half of the wards. If, indeed, we take the central belt of Strathclyde, Central, Lothian, Fife and Tayside, then Labour had candidates in 671 of the 770 wards in this heavily populated area (87.1%), a remarkable performance. As compared with the Regional elections, the Conservatives show a marked fall in the proportion of seats contested from 58.8% to 48.3%. This probably indicates a greater willingness on the part of the Conservatives to allow Labour to be opposed by Independents at District as opposed to Regional level, as well as an unwillingness on the part of many Conservatives to stand on a party ticket at the very local level.

For the reasons given when we considered unopposed returns in Regional elections, it is important that these be borne in mind. As before, Independents were the most likely to be returned unopposed, while amongst the parties, Labour took more seats without opposition than the others.

Comparison of this table with the turnout figures given for the Regional elections shows that turnout in the District elections was higher. This might seem slightly paradoxical in view of the fact that the Regional authorities are the larger and more powerful, and the parties seemed to concur in this view by contesting more of the Regional seats. This last point, however, helps to explain the higher turnout in the Districts. Because almost all Regional seats were contested, they were bound to include wards which were not contested at District level, while almost all wards contested at District level were also part of contested Regional divisions. So people living in contested wards had a greater incentive to go to the polls than those who lived in uncontested wards and contested Regional divisions. This argument sounds somewhat complex but a little thought should make it clearer.

Another point about turnout arises from the varying level of contests at District and Regional levels. Usually it is safe seats that are left uncontested, and usually also these seats have a lower than average turnout. A greater proportion of safe seats was left uncontested in the District elections than in the Regional elections so that a greater proportion of low turnout seats is left out of the reckoning when turnout is calculated.

As we noted before, turnout in these elections showed a marked increase over turnout in local elections in Scotland in recent years.

There is no doubt that the 1974 local elections in Scotland were the most keenly contested for many years. There were 2,559 candidates for 1,116 District seats which gives an average of 2.3 candidates for every seat. In these terms, the most keenly contested Districts were in the Lothian and Strathclyde Regions (2.7 and 2.6 candidates per seat respectively). The Borders Region once again shows least competition with only 1.5 candidates for every seat at stake.

As before, the Labour Party put forward more candidates than any other party or group.

Overall 14.4% of District election candidates were women, a slightly higher proportion than was the case in Regional elections, which suggests that the parties were rather more willing to select women for the lower tier authority seats. The smallest proportion this time was in the Borders (7.4%) and the largest in Fife (17.1%). Amongst the parties the SNP again had the largest proportion (18.6%) though followed closely by the Conservatives (18.2%). The Communists, as before, had the lowest proportion of women candidates of any party (11.7%).

As in the Regional elections, women candidates in the District elections tended to do less well than men in many seats, irrespective of party. The point must be stressed, however, that this does not necessarily mean that electors prefer to vote for men. More likely it means that women had less chance of being selected by their parties for 'winnable' seats. It would also be unfair to blame the parties entirely for this; the fact is that on the whole women tend to be less interested in and less involved in politics than men, so that when parties are looking for candidates many more men than women are prepared to come forward.

The cautionary comments which were made about party vote totals in the Regional elections also apply here.

It is, however, interesting to note that while the vote for all parties in the District elections is lower than that at the Regional elections, the total votes gathered by Independents is greater in this case. This probably arises from the fact that District wards are much smaller in size than Regional electoral divisions. (The average electorate of the former was 3,274 and of the latter, 8,458). An Independent has, therefore, a much greater chance of being personally known by the electors in a District ward and is, therefore, more likely to obtain their support. As we noted in Table 3, however, it is also probable that the lower proportion of District seats contested by the Conservatives helped Independent candidates.

This table puts the data contained in Table 11 into percentages. The percentage share of the vote gained by each party, over the country as a whole, is almost exactly the same in the District elections as in the Regional elections. The exception is the Conservative Party which had 28.6% of the Regional vote but only 26.8% of the District vote. The Independents on the other hand obtained 12.4% of the Regional vote and 14.1% of the District vote. This lends support to the last point made about the previous table.

Within the various Regions the pattern is very much the same as in the Regional elections.

The tables which follow show the votes and the percentage share of the vote gained by the parties in each of the 53 Districts. Any adequate commentary upon these data would require very much more space than is available here and so we leave the reader to peruse them for himself and draw his own conclusions. It is perhaps just worth pointing out the very few Districts in which one party achieved an absolute majority of the votes cast. The Conservatives achieved this feat in North East Fife District, while Labour recorded more than 50% of the votes in Midlothian, Monklands, Motherwell and Kilmarnock and Loudoun.

This final table shows the number of rejected ballot papers in each District. This enables the reader to calculate the turnout for each District by adding the figures given here to the total votes for the parties and dividing the total by the electorate in contested divisions. (The electorate can be obtained by summing the electorate figures given in the detailed ward results).

As a matter of interest the record for the lowest proportion of spoilt ballots goes to Bishopbriggs and Kirkintilloch (0.50%) and that for the highest proportion to Roxburgh (2.47%). The differences here may however reflect the relative strictness of the Returning Officers rather than differences in the behaviour of electors.

This book offers a factual exercise for those interested in the recent history of Scotland. At the same time it provides a basis for guidance and information for those who are determining the future.

The authors have studied the growth rate of Scotland in terms of total expenditure at constant prices, and have shown that over the period 1961-1971 expenditure in Scotland grew faster than that in the U.K. as a whole. They have prepared estimates for Scotland of the components of total expenditure, that is consumer expenditure, investment and the spending of central government and local authorities; and they have reviewed previous attempts to compile social accounts for Scotland and show how their estimates relate to these. In addition, estimate of the incidence of taxation and of subsidies on all forms of expenditure has been taken into account, and comparisons are presented between Scotland and the United Kingdom.

The facts and figures presented in this book provide a source for those seeking to understand the behaviour of Scotland's economy in the years between 1961 and 1971, while the methods used for the calculations should afford a basis for future assessments of gross domestic expenditure.
