

Twentieth Century Local Election Results

Volume 3:
Summary Data:
Inner London County & Borough Elections
1889-1998

Preface

These three volumes of results for the London County Council and London Boroughs are the first in a series that will provide a record of local election results prior to reorganisation in the 1960s for the capital and 1970s for elsewhere. Some local electoral data for London has previously made its way into the public domain but it has been difficult to trace and it certainly was not published in a convenient form. These books not only help to fill the considerable gap in our knowledge but they also present the information in a way that is both informative and stimulating. It is possible, for example, to examine the fate of individual candidates over a succession of elections. The emergence of parties competing for local office can be tracked at the ward level. One can examine how the politics of the twentieth century impacts on local politics at ward or borough level.

But these volumes do not merely inform, rather they present the election results in such a way that the reader begins to look for patterns and rhythms in the electoral process. Thus, we can see that Labour's rise, and the corresponding decline of the Liberals, were far from uniform across London. In some areas Labour rose rapidly to electoral dominance but in others the battle was more fiercely fought. In terms of the electorate the impact of the extension of the franchise following World War 1 is all too apparent. What is less apparent is the way in which the electorate grew but then began to decline as wider demographic change took effect. These results help hint at the sometimes complex relationship between the size of the electorate and the relative strength of individual parties. Although these volumes deal with elections from a different century they will still be used to inform debates about local government in this century. The level of local electoral turnout is a topic of considerable interest. Voters have apparently forsaken local government, bringing into question its democratic foundation. Critics appear to suggest that once there was a golden age of local government with powerful authorities supported by substantial electoral mandates. Other observers maintain that electoral turnout is not in terminal decline but rather has periodic movements downwards but also upwards. Here we have evidence over a considerable time span with which to test the soundness of these arguments.

Alan Willis and John Woollard have, over the years, developed a considerable expertise in the collection, collation and manipulation of local electoral data. They were vital parts of the team that published in 1993, Local Elections in Britain: A Statistical Digest, a snapshot of each local authority's electoral history since 1973. We are aware more than most of the sheer hard work and dedication that must go into compiling electoral data of this magnitude and complexity. In the preface to that earlier volume we wrote that their next target was a collection of election results from 1945 until reorganisation. Typically, they have exceeded their own and our expectation in providing results from 1889 in the case of the London County Council and 1900 for the London Boroughs. As such they have provided an invaluable and permanent resource for students, academics, journalists, politicians and others that will be mined for many years to come. But as we write the process of collecting further data continues. Other books are planned in this series. With these three volumes they have reached base camp but the climb goes on.

Introduction

The amount of electoral data contained in these three volumes is simply breathtaking. In writing this short essay we can do little more than offer a brief overview of what we believe to be the most salient points. For now our principal concerns are to describe the ebb and flow of partisan support across this time period, to explore the successes and failure of individual parties and the extent of party competition, and finally the electorate in terms of representation and its participation in the electoral process. Some may quibble with our approach, suggesting instead that there should be a much greater analysis of individual candidates and their attempts to be elected. It would be difficult to argue with that point of view. For example, we could report that a total of 49,646 candidates stood for election to the London borough councils between 1900-1962, while 5,830 contested the London County Elections (LCC) from 1889-1961. A more detailed analysis of those candidates would reveal the number of times a particular individual might have stood (although provided only with surname and initial a great deal of detective work would still be required). Another valid question would ask for the identity of the most and least successful candidates. Measured in terms of votes the leading contenders for most successful candidates would be, in the case of borough elections, J. Curtis, who contested the Streatham ward in Wandsworth in 1925 and received 11,215 votes and Henry Brooke, later Home Secretary, who polled 25,300 votes in the 1949 LCC elections. There were a number of ties for the title of least successful candidate. There were three instances when a candidate polled just six votes, with one ward, East Finsbury, featured on two occasions, in 1928 and again in 1949. There are numerous other similar lines of inquiry but they will have to wait for another time.

London County Council, 1889-1961

Elections for the London County Council (LCC) began in 1889. At first a large number of candidates eschewed party labels but the authority quickly became party politicised. Table 1, which details vote share for the 22 elections held between 1889–1961, shows the move away from the two party politics of Conservative and Liberal and its brief replacement in the immediate aftermath of WW1 with a three party system. Labour's rapid rise to a third of the popular vote came at the expense of both of the former major parties, but principally the Liberals. Labour's initial surge in 1919 helped drive down the Liberal vote to just over 24 per cent and apart from a brief rally in the late 1920s there was a steady and apparently inexorable decline. From then on Labour's grip on the council grew steadily until in 1934 it finally won an absolute majority of votes cast. On only a single occasion thereafter did Labour's vote fall below 50 per cent. The Liberal's fall from electoral grace was no less dramatic. In 1961, however, Liberal hopes rallied just as the LCC was about to be replaced by the Greater London Council (GLC). The Conservative party too was affected by the rise of Labour. In the three elections held before the outbreak of WW1 the party secured a clear majority of votes cast. After the war it was a different story and it was not until 1931 that the party could claim majority support. Three years later the Conservatives were deposed as the principal party in London, a title that stretched back to 1907. From the 1930s onwards the battle for London became a two-party struggle between Conservative and Labour, but on only two occasions, 1931 and 1949, were the Conservatives victorious.

There can be little doubt that the operation of the electoral system ensured the early dominance of candidates sympathetic to the Conservative or Liberal cause. On balance the configuration of boundaries appears to have favoured Liberal candidates (see Table 2). At the 1892 elections, for example, Liberal candidates captured over 70 per cent of seats, having won only a bare majority of votes. The following elections saw the Conservatives win half the vote but instead of receiving the 'winner's bonus' that is the custom under the 'first past the post' system it was the Liberals who won the most seats. It was not until 1907 that the Conservatives emerged as the leading party, a position retained until 1931. In its initial years of campaigning the Labour party suffered a fate well known to emerging parties under first past the post rules. In 1910 and 1913 the party polled more than five per cent of the vote but its share of seats was less than half that figure. By 1919 the disparity between vote and seat share grew alarmingly (33.7 per cent vote share; 12.1 per cent seat share) but this was partly a function of the large number of uncontested seats (44.2 per cent) at that year's elections. In 1922 the situation was little better with a third of votes bringing the party one-eighth of seats on the LCC. Gradually, the Liberal vote was squeezed, although up until 1931 Labour's vote share exceeded its share of seats. That election was the Liberal's last real opportunity of retaining some council presence. Apart from a brief respite in 1949 the party was unable to gain any representation. In the post-war era Labour's dominance was unequivocal and electoral landslides were commonplace. In the six elections held between 1946-1961 the party captured two-thirds or more of the seats on four occasions. In 1958 eight out of every ten LCC members was Labour. During the long period of Conservative dominance of national government, therefore, it was the Opposition party that occupied County Hall. Plus ça change, plus ça la même chose.

Elections to the LCC were largely contested - see Table 3. Less than 2 per cent of the 118 seats were uncontested at the inaugural elections in 1889 and although that figure rose slightly three years later it became the norm for competition to take place. There were some notable exceptions. At the end of both world wars the proportion of uncontested seats was 44.3 per cent in 1919 and 11.5 per cent in 1946. Every seat in the five elections from 1949-1961 was contested. Moreover, the degree of competition was also healthy. In 1928 there was an average of 2.8 candidates chasing each vacancy and that ratio never fell below two until the council was abolished in the early 1960s. Although the Liberal party had disappeared from view during the 1930s and 1940s by the early 1950s it was contesting more seats and in 1961 more than half the contests featured candidates from the three main parties.

The electoral divisions for the LCC were coterminous with the boundaries of parliamentary constituencies. For that reason any adjustments to boundaries were dependent upon revisions of the parliamentary boundaries. The number of directly elected county seats was adjusted on only three occasions between 1889-1964. In fact, the original 118-member council remained intact until 1919 when an increase of six seats was approved. Between 1949-1955 the number of elected councillors rose to its maximum of 129 only to fall back to 126 in 1955 for the final three elections. These fairly minor alterations should be set alongside the dramatic rise in electorate size. As Table 4 shows, the mean ward electorate in 1892 was less than nine thousand. The number of electors per councillor was even smaller. On average each LCC councillor represented 4,299 electors, with no councillor representing more than 6,606 electors. There was, of course, still a restricted franchise at this time. As London's population continued to increase, the franchise extended, and the size of the council held constant the councillor/elector ratio began to rise inexorably. By 1913 the average councillor represented 13,865 electors – a rise of 58% compared with 1892. In some areas the need for a thoroughgoing boundary review was all too apparent. Wandsworth's two LCC members were responsible for almost 49,000 electors – exactly the same number of councillors that represented the 3,845 electors in St George, Tower Hamlets. Although boundary changes prior to 1919 did alleviate the worst of such anomalies it did lead to a virtual doubling of pre-war electorate sizes. The average councillor/elector ratio in 1919 was 13,020 but the range between best and worst narrowed sharply. From then on electorates grew until 1949 when the mean electorate stood at 59,134 – almost seven times larger than its Victorian equivalent. During the 1950s, however, the demographic pattern was for inner-city populations to decrease at the expense of the suburbs. Nevertheless, disparities between electorate size remained. The larger wards sometimes contained double the number of electors compared with the smallest.

Was there ever a golden age of electoral turnout for elections to the LCC? Before WW1, turnout was certainly considerably higher than it is for recent local election contests. Turnout only once fell below 40 per cent (in 1901) and in the three elections between 1907-1913 a majority of electors participated. But this was a largely male, middle-class electorate. Following the war and the extension of the franchise, and disregarding the unusual circumstances of the 1919 elections, turnout declined and appears to have stabilised, averaging 35 per cent in the twelve elections commencing with those in 1922. Such a figure may help explain the origin of the conventional wisdom that only one in three electors bother to vote in local elections. The evidence suggests, therefore, that at least as far as the LCC was concerned, that if like is compared with like, there was never a 'golden age' of electoral turnout.

London Boroughs

In the early days of London borough elections candidates stood under a range of different guises but as with the LCC elections, it has been possible to allocate votes to nationally recognised parties. Conservatives, for example, described themselves as Moderates or campaigned under the banner of Municipal Reform. Likewise, Liberals fought elections under the Progressive banner. Electoral pacts, primarily between Municipal Reform and Progressive candidates, against the rising threat posed by Labour, were also a significant feature of the electoral landscape in the first part of the twentieth century. For such reasons, therefore, Table 5 should not be regarded as a definitive statement about the distribution of partisan support but it does shed some light on the growth and development of partisan support. The first elections saw Conservative-leaning candidates edge ahead of the Progressives with a large vote for Independents. The following round of elections went to the Liberals but then in 1906 a long period of Conservative dominance began. This period was only interrupted in 1919 when the Labour party's rise led to an erosion of the Conservative vote share but a halving of the Liberal's share. The virtual demise of the Liberals and a period of consolidation for Labour meant that the Conservatives were in command until 1934. During the inter-war years the electoral cycle for the LCC and boroughs was synchronised, except that county elections took place in April and borough contests in November. In April 1934 Labour achieved an absolute majority of votes cast at the LCC elections. The following November it repeated its performance. From then on Labour only twice failed to emulate that feat as demographic change began to favour the party. Conservative councillors supplied the main opposition. Support for the Liberals, severely depleted in 1919, went into further decline and it was not until its recovery in 1962 that the party secured a vote share into double figures.

An examination of Table 6, which details seat share at borough council election reveals two periods where a single party has enjoyed a long run of electoral success. In 1906 the Conservatives captured almost three-quarters of available seats. In the following seven electoral cycles the party only once failed to win an absolute majority of council seats. As this period of dominance came to an end another began. Labour's success in 1934 saw it capture a majority of seats for the first time, a position it retained beyond the re-organisation of London government in 1964 until 1968. Labour's biggest victory came in 1945, following its general election landslide earlier in the year. Labour won more than a thousand seats at those elections as the Conservative party was reduced to just 315 borough councillors, its lowest ever share of representation. The fate of the Liberals mirrored the party's experience on the LCC. There were only two elections, 1903 and 1931, when the Progressive/Liberal seat share exceeded vote share. An early sign of how the electoral system would disadvantage the party came in 1912. Then, the party polled 31.8 per cent of the vote but was rewarded with fewer than one in five seats. By 1919 its position had deteriorated still further with seat share almost half that of vote share. Between 1934-1961 the party did not have a single councillor on any of the 28 boroughs. Following advances at parliamentary by-elections, such as that in Orpington in March 1962, the Liberals enjoyed a boost in support. However, at the 1962 elections the party did not do as well in London as it did elsewhere. In London the party suffered the classic fate of any minor party that contests in a first past the post system but fails to concentrate its vote in a relatively small number of winnable seats. Liberal candidates received 10 per cent of the vote but won less than one per cent of seats.

Minor parties sometimes featured prominently at borough elections. In the 1930s, for example, various Fascist groups campaigned strongly in London's East End. At the 1937 elections Fascist candidates polled well in Bethnal Green, capturing a fifth of votes in some wards. In Shoreditch, and to a greater extent in Stepney, the British Union of Fascists challenged Labour in its heartland. At the 1945 elections it was Communist candidates that challenged Labour in many of its wards. In Finsbury's Old Street ward a Communist finished top of the poll, as did three Communist candidates in the Covent Garden ward of Westminster borough. However, the party's greatest breakthrough occurred in Stepney where the party won 5 of the borough's 20 wards, some with sizeable majorities. The party fared less well at the 1949 elections, losing two of its wards and by 1953 it had lost its representation altogether.

There is a marked contrast between the level of competition for county seats and for those in the boroughs. As Table 7 shows, a proportion of councillors were returned unopposed at every one of the 18 election rounds. This compares with 10 out of 22 elections for the county council where every vacancy was contested. Of course, the number of borough seats was considerably greater but by modern standards the proportion of uncontested seats in such densely populated areas is large. Remarkably, in 1912, there was no election in one in five seats. In Westminster 11 of the borough's 14 wards were uncontested and in Holborn and Stoke Newington every member was returned unopposed. Local agreements had been made to avoid the costs of an election. In other boroughs too the evidence of unopposed wards returning councillors of different party persuasions suggest that such pacts, if not commonplace, were far from unusual. Where competition did take place, however, it was normal for an average of two candidates to fight each vacancy, suggesting that the lack of contestation was largely a result of local parties not wishing to fight lost causes, rather than a failure of candidates to present themselves.

Although multi-member wards are still used in local elections this practice was both more widespread and the ratio of seats to wards much higher in the London boroughs. There were a number of two member wards but it was usual for wards to be represented by 3, 6, or 9 councillors. The only logic in using multiples of three would seem to be that had the boroughs moved to an annual, rather than triennial electoral cycle, a wholesale revision of ward boundaries would have been unnecessary. Outside London other cities that formed county boroughs held annual elections but any plans to bring the two systems into line were resisted. To this day London and metropolitan borough elections are run on different schedules. The large number of seats to be filled in individual wards sometimes led to a large number of candidates on the ballot paper. On two occasions, East ward in Bethnal Green in 1928 and Cavendish ward, St. Marylebone, 1949, no fewer than 36 candidates contested the election.

In 1900 the average ward electorate was slightly less than three thousand (see Table 8). There was then a steady rise until 1919 when, as with the LCC divisions, the average ward electorate doubled. Between 1919-1962 the average electorate remained fairly constant. At the final elections in 1962 average electorate size was barely unchanged from what it had been in 1919. A much more complex picture appears when councillor/elector ratios are examined. In the early borough elections the average councillor represented just over five hundred electors. However, there was even then a considerable range in that ratio. In 1900 the largest councillor/elector ratio was 974 with a minimum value of just 138. As populations fluctuated, both within and across boroughs, the range between highest and smallest continued to increase. Following WW2 the situation had deteriorated still further because of the destruction of large parts of the capital. In 1945 some councillors were representing more than five thousand electors. By contrast the three councillors in the St. Thomas ward in Bermondsey found themselves representing a total of 198 electors. Another way of stating this difference in councillor/elector ratios is that the voters in St. Thomas's had 83 times the voting power of those electors located in the largest ward. Although such inequalities did not continue for too long it was still the case that at the final elections in 1962 electors in the smallest ward had 40 times the voting power of those located in the largest ward. A boundary revision was somewhat overdue.

As with the LCC, borough turnout was higher on the restricted franchise prior to 1919 than subsequently. Indeed, it was only in 1925 that turnout rose above 40 per cent. Thereafter, turnout remained stuck within a nine point band until 1962. This picture should, perhaps, be contrasted with the period 1982-1994 when turnout averaged above 40 per cent in the modern day equivalents of the old boroughs. However, too much should not be read into these statistics. The pattern of party competition, the nature of election campaigning, and much else besides, has changed beyond recognition.

This snapshot of local elections in London has helped show how the electoral climate evolved over the century. From its Victorian origins the electoral and party system evolved, often gradually, sometimes dramatically. The most significant change was undoubtedly the replacement of the Liberals by Labour. This process, which began just before WW1 and continued for a short time afterwards, condemned the Liberals to a long period of electoral obscurity. It was only in the early 1980s that the party began to stage something of a recovery in that part of London covered by these boroughs. Once Labour had become established as the principal opposition to the Conservative party it lost no time in forging a dominant position for itself. Its dominance was such that the Conservatives were forced into re-considering local government arrangements in the capital. Naturally, the London Labour party objected to the proposed creation of the GLC and a revision of the boroughs. This was seen merely as a way of breaking Labour's grip on the governance of the capital. Labour was right to be against reform. By 1967 the GLC had fallen into Conservative hands.

Party politics came to London earlier than in many other local authorities. Although candidates stood under a variety of titles voters would have had little problem in identifying many of those candidates with the main political parties. The Conservative party in particular held out longest in not declaring its candidates openly but after WW2 it too followed the general tendency towards party descriptions. However, there is still much to learn about the nature of party competition. Although electoral pacts in the form of anti-socialist alliances were common we have not analysed the nature and impact of these in any detail. The use of multiple member wards meant that electors were often faced with long ballot papers. How far partisan support extended is another critical issue deserving of more detailed analysis. Was there a tendency for voters to cast all available ballots in favour of one particular party, and if not, which candidates benefited as a result? Another issue that we have not examined is how the electoral system translated votes into seats. There are a significant number of occasions when a single party won every available seat at some borough elections. There are occasions too when the party ahead in the popular vote failed to win the most council seats. Unfortunately, there is insufficient space here to delve into such issues but now these electoral data have been published there will doubtless be others to take up the challenge.
