PREFACE

The third round of elections for the unitary Scottish local councils took place on May 1st 2003. As in the previous round of elections in 1999, these were held on the same day as the Scottish Parliament elections. Whereas in Wales the council elections were postponed in order to avoid a clash with elections for the National Assembly, the Scottish Executive apparently took the view that the inevitable overshadowing of the local elections by the Parliament elections was a price worth paying in order to secure the likely benefit of a higher local turnout than would otherwise be the case. A more cynical view of this decision was taken by author of the independent and critical 'Scottish Politics' web site (<http://www.alba.org.uk/home2.html>) which commented as follows

There is, of course, a hidden agenda. If the last elections are anything to go by, local issues will not be discussed at all and the election will be dominated by nationwide issues. This of course will suit the administrations of certain councils who would prefer to be re-elected without any public discussion of the way they have been running local services.

Whatever the rights and wrongs of the decision to hold all the elections together – which meant that electors had to vote for a constituency member of the Scottish Parliament, for a regional party list and for a local councillor – there is no doubt that the local elections were overshadowed, barely rating a mention in the Scottish national press or on television during the campaign period.

As we have suggested on previous occasions, however, local elections remain interesting in their own right. Not only do they determine political control of local authorities but ward results also provide a much more finely-grained picture of the geographical distribution of party support than is possible at constituency level. The Scottish Parliamentary Boundary Commission is currently undertaking a wide-ranging review of constituency boundaries and it is local council wards which form the building blocks of the new constituencies. For these and other reasons we decided to continue the series of volumes begun in 1974 by John Bochel and David Denver which aims to provide, in a convenient and accessible form, authoritative details of the results of Scottish local elections together with summaries and analysis of the figures. This could well be the last time this form of presentation and analysis is possible since the ruling Labour-Labour Democrat coalition making up the Scottish Executive is committed to abolishing single-member wards with first-past-the-post elections and introducing some form of proportional representation for local councils.

Councils are listed in alphabetical order – including the prefixes 'East', 'West' and so on – since this appears to be most convenient for users. The former Western Isles council is now identified by its (official) Gaelic name (Comhairle nan Eilean Siar) and the former Borders as Scottish Borders. Within authorities, wards are listed by number and women candidates are identified by the prefix 'Ms'. We show the votes gained by each candidate but not the number of rejected ballots – any enthusiast who would like details of the latter should contact either Hugh Bochel or David Denver – although these are included in the calculation of turnout. The abbreviations used to identify the party affiliations of candidates are as follows:

BIG	Brechin Independent Group
BNP	British National Party
Comm	Communist
Con	Conservative
Country	Countryside Party
Firefighter	Firefighters Against Cuts
Green	Green Party
Ind	Independent
Ind Green	Independent Green
IndLab	Independent Labour
IndLD	Independent Scottish Liberal Democrat
IndSN	Independent Scottish Nationalist
IWCA	Independent Working Class Association

LHS	Independent Camp for LHS
Lib	Liberal
LibDem	Liberal Democrat
Liberty	Liberty Party
NF	National Front
ResAss	Residents Association
SNP	Scottish National Party
SocLab	Socialist Labour
SSP	Scottish Socialist Party
SUP	Scottish Unionist Party
UKIP	United Kingdom Independence Party

We have classified candidates as 'Independent' if they described themselves as such on nomination or if they offered no description at all. The data presented here were collected directly from the returning officers of the local authorities or from the council websites.

We are grateful to Graham Johnson for help with inputting data and other aspects of the work involved in putting this material together and to Patrick Lynch for again helping with the construction of the database. Although every effort has been made to ensure accuracy it is inevitable that errors will remain. These, we hope, are few and inconsequential but we apologise for them in advance.

COMMENTARY ON THE RESULTS

Introduction

The local elections held in England on the same day as the Scottish local elections were seen as a major test of the current popularity of the parties. In particular, commentators suggested that they could well determine the future of Iain Duncan Smith as leader of the Conservatives. As it turned out, the Conservatives did well and any immediate threat to Smith's position was removed. In Scotland, however, the fact that the local elections were held on the same day as the Scottish Parliament elections meant that, during the campaign period and in the aftermath, the council elections were largely ignored. It remains the case, however, that Scottish council elections are a regular feature of the electoral scene which, apart from providing a good indication of the standing of the parties, determine the important question of party control of local authorities and are central to the health of local democracy.

We provide here, therefore, a commentary on the 2003 election results covering in particular candidates, contests and turnout as well as the pattern of party support and the consequences of this for control of local authorities. It is important to note that, in order to maintain comparability with previous commentaries, the main part of the discussion excludes Comhairle nan Eilean Siar, Orkney and Shetland which cover very small populations and remain dominated by Independent councillors. A brief note on their elections is given at the end of this commentary.

Candidates

In the first round of elections for the new authorities in 1995 there were more candidates (3511) for the new councils than there had ever been in a single set of elections under the old system of Districts and Regions. As table A shows, this total was surpassed in 1999, even though there were slightly fewer seats at stake (due to ward boundary revisions), but in 2003 yet another new record was set with more than 4,000 candidates contesting the elections. If the health of local democracy is measured by the willingness of candidates to come forward, then there seems little cause for alarm in Scotland.

The main cause of the rise in total candidate numbers was the sharp increase in candidates from the Scottish Socialist Party (SSP), a Trotskyist party led by the outspoken and high-profile Member of the Scottish Parliament (MSP), Tommy Sheridan. In 1999 the great majority of SSP candidates were in Glasgow (64) and Dundee (14), the remaining 22 being scattered across nine other councils. In 2003, however, as well as contesting 77 of Glasgow's 79 wards, the party had candidates in all but four council areas (Angus, Clackmannanshire, Perth and Kinross and East Renfrewshire), popping up in unlikely places such as Argyll and Bute, Scottish Borders and Moray and having sharply increased numbers in others such as Edinburgh and North and South Lanarkshire.

As far as the major parties are concerned, the Conservatives maintained their progress in putting forward candidates with notable increases in Dumfries and Galloway (+18), South Lanarkshire (+17) and Fife, (+13). They contested all seats in nine councils (compared with six in 1999) and less than 50% in only seven. The Liberal Democrats also fielded a record number of candidates (+17 in Glasgow, +16 in Angus and +11 in West Lothian) and fought every seat in nine councils (including, somewhat surprisingly, Fife, where they were the only party to do so). There remain significant areas of weakness, however. Across the three Ayrshire councils, the Liberal Democrats could muster only one candidate and they had none in West Dunbartonshire. On the other hand, the numbers of Labour and SNP candidates declined. Labour contested 79.4% of all wards (compared with 84.3% in 1999) and although 100% of seats were contested in 16 councils this was three fewer than in 1999. The biggest declines were in areas where the party is not really in contention, such as Perth and Kinross (-15) and Aberdeenshire (-9) although the drop in Fife (-8) is harder to explain. In terms of candidates the SNP remained the leading party in 2003 (contesting 83.9% of wards) but their numbers also showed the largest decrease (the comparable figure in 1999 being 91.6%). There was again a large drop in Fife (-18) while Aberdeenshire, Dumfries and Galloway, and Highland each had 11 fewer candidates than in 1999. Whereas in the latter election the SNP contested all wards in 22 councils, this figure fell to 15 councils in 2003.

Note: Here and in subsequent tables, figures for the SSP in 1995 refer to Scottish Militant Labour, the forerunner of the SSP.

All tables in this commentary exclude the three islands councils.

It is relatively easy to understand the rise in the number of Conservative and Liberal Democrat candidates – put simply, both had plenty of ground to make up – but less easy to explain the decline in Labour and SNP candidates. It may be that these parties experienced difficulties in recruiting candidates and that the fall in their nominations was an early warning of their decline in popularity among the electorate. On the other hand, parties' resources are stretched at the best of times and it may be that because the two leading parties in Scotland were heavily committed to the Scottish Parliament elections they were unable to sustain previous efforts at local level.

The data in table A point to an additional surprising feature of the 2003 local elections. The long, slow decline of Independents evident since 1974 was abruptly reversed as the number of such candidates increased by almost 100. The 391 Independents contested 315 wards (the numbers being different because Independents oppose one another in some places) representing 27.4% of the total as compared with 20.9% in 1999. This was not simply due to a resurgence of activity in areas where local politics has been traditionally non-partisan. Indeed, in some of these - Scottish Borders, Dumfries and Galloway and Aberdeenshire - the number of Independent candidates declined further. Rather, there was a general increase involving councils such as Angus (+15), Fife (+14), Edinburgh (+8), East Renfrewshire (+5) and others. Across the 29 councils, there was an increase in the number of Independent candidates between 1999 and 2003 in 21. This may reflect in a small way what might be interpreted as a sort of revolt by the electorate against the established parties which was also evident in the Scottish Parliament elections (especially in the list voting).

One of the unmistakable trends in Scottish local elections since 1974 has been a steady increase in the number of women candidates and councillors. As Table B shows, this trend continued in respect of candidates, the proportion rising slightly in 2003 to a new record of 28.5%. Among the parties, the Liberal Democrats once again had the largest proportion of women (37.6%) followed by the Conservatives with 32.3%. There was a slight fall, however, in the proportion of women among elected councillors. In terms of numbers, Labour still has almost twice as many women councillors (102) as the Liberal Democrats (57) who have the second largest number. Proportionately, East Dunbartonshire and North Ayrshire (both with 33%) had the largest representation of women. At the other end of the scale, there is only one woman out of 20 councillors in Inverclyde.

Contests

The proportion of wards in mainland councils that went uncontested (2.5%) reached a new low in 2003. Of the 29 wards concerned, 20 were in the Highland council area but no other council had more than 3 uncontested wards. In this respect Scottish local elections have been transformed over the past 25 years. In 1980 more than a quarter (26.0%) of District council wards were uncontested but that figure has fallen very steadily so that today uncontested wards are rare. This is another indication that local democracy is in a relatively robust condition.

Turnout

The most important measure of the health of local democracy, however, is usually thought to be the turnout of electors. That there are rising numbers of candidates and contests shows that the parties are interested but are the voters? Since the last two rounds of local elections have coincided with Scottish Parliament elections this is a difficult question to answer. Table C compares overall turnout in contested wards in the council elections with turnout in the Scottish Parliament elections in 1999 and 2003. In both cases the turnout in the two elections is very similar. It would seem that only a tiny proportion of the electorate turn up at the polls to vote in the Parliament election but cannot be bothered to vote in the local election. What is unknowable, of course, is what the turnout would have been if there had only been local elections. It is impossible to tell whether in that case local turnout would have been dramatically worse and whether in that sense conflating the two sets of elections paid off.

Table C
Turnout in Scottish Parliament and Council Elections 1999-2003

Scottish Parliament	Council Elections	Scottish Parliament	Council Elections
1999	1999	2003	2003
%	%	%	%
58.8	58.1	49.4	49.1

Note: For comparability these figures do not include rejected ballots.

Variations in local election turnout across councils and wards were, therefore, largely by-products of differential turnout in the Scottish Parliament elections. In other words, local election turnout had little to do with local politics but was affected by matters specific to the Parliament elections - such as constituency marginality - and by the contextual variables which are regularly associated with variations in turnout such as the class composition of the area concerned.

These latter factors tend to make variations in turnout across local authorities relatively predictable and this is illustrated by the fact that the correlation coefficient measuring the strength of the association between turnout at the 1999 local elections and local turnout in 2003 across the 29 council areas was 0.890. This indicates a very strong relationship - councils which had higher turnouts in 1999 also had higher turnouts in 2003; those where turnout was lower in 1999 were also towards the bottom end in 2003. In both elections the lowest turnout in mainland Scotland was in Glasgow and the highest in East Renfrewshire.

The fact that we have ward-level data enables us to explore turnout variation across Scotland in a little more detail than is possible using figures for constituencies or entire local authorities. The range of turnouts at ward level was very large. As in 1999, the ward which recorded the highest turnout (70.2%) was Fairmilehead in Edinburgh but it was 65% or more in 14 wards. At the other extreme turnout was below 30% in seven wards, all of them in Glasgow, including Merchant City which had the lowest turnout of all (28.1%). The general pattern of turnout across wards was very similar to that in 1999 - the correlation coefficient in this case is +0.891 (N = 1097). Table D shows first the mean turnout in wards won by each of the parties. Turnout was clearly highest in Conservative wards and lowest in Labour wards with the others falling somewhere between. Party, here, is a kind of shorthand surrogate for a cluster of socioeconomic characteristics associated with party support. We can interpret the figures as demonstrating the turnout was highest in more middle-class, affluent, suburban areas and lower in more working class, poorer areas. This, of course, is nothing new. Table D also shows how turnout changed from 1999 in these groups of wards and in this case there was very little difference between the different types of ward. Turnout, the data suggest, declined by about the same amount across the board.

Patterns of Party Support

Insofar as they pay attention to local elections, what most concerns the media and the general public is the performances of the parties, especially the numbers of seats won and lost. We begin this section by looking at the shares of votes received by the parties. Table E compares the distribution of party support in 2003 with the two previous sets of elections under the current local government structure.

Table E
Share of Votes in Local Elections 1995-2003

	1995	1999	2003	Change 1999-03
Con	11.3	13.7	15.2	+1.5
Lab	43.8	36.6	32.9	-3.7
Lib Dem	9.7	12.7	14.6	+1.9

SSP	0.6	0.9	3.4	+2.5
Ind	7.6	6.5	9.5	+3.0
Others	0.9	0.8	0.2	-0.6

The Conservatives reached an all-time low in Scotland in 1995 but since then have staged a mini-recovery, which by 2003 saw them back above 15% of the votes cast. This is still poor for a party that used to run Labour close in Scotland, but at least the Conservatives appear to be moving in the right direction, if rather slowly. The Liberal Democrats are also on an upward track and are now almost level with the Conservatives in terms of popular support at local elections. On the other hand, the SNP suffered a sharp setback in 2003 in what was a disappointing set of elections for the party. Labour's vote share also fell and, at less than a third, represented the worst Labour performance in local elections since 1977. In contrast, the SSP made a significant impact for the first time and, as previously mentioned, there was a clear reversal of fortune for Independent candidates.

We have already seen, however, that there were significant changes in the numbers of candidates put forward by the parties and variations in candidatures clearly affect the level of support that the parties obtain - if there is no party candidate in a ward, no votes for the party can be cast. Thus the 'raw' figures shown in table E may be misleading to some extent as indicators of party popularity. To get a clearer picture of trends, we can compare 1999 and 2003 results in wards contested by the same parties on both occasions. Table F shows figures for wards contested by all four parties and for those contested by the Conservatives, Labour and SNP. In each case the general trends shown for the major parties by the overall figures are confirmed, although the improvement in the popularity of the Conservatives is even more modest than Table E suggests once their increased number of candidates is discounted. It is interesting to note also that in wards contested by all four major parties the SNP slipped back from second to fourth place.

Table F
Shares of Votes in Wards Contested by Same Parties 1999-2003

	1999 %	2003 %	Change %

Labour	32.6	28.2	-4.4
Lib Dem	21.4	25.1	+3.7
SNP	24.1	20.6	-3.5
Others	1.3	4.8	+3.5
Con v Lab v SNP (N = 147)
Conservative	18.5	19.8	+1.3
Labour	47.0	45.9	-1.1
SNP	32.1	27.9	-4.2
Others	2.4	6.4	+4.0

The same sort of analysis confirms that the advance of the SSP was not simply an artefact of the party's increased number of candidates. In the 87 wards contested in both 1999 and 2003, the SSP's share of the vote rose from 8.2% to 14.6%.

Further details of the pattern of party support are given in summary tables 9 and 10 at the end of the booklet which show the distribution of votes within individual authorities. Despite an increased number of candidates and a gentle rise in overall support, the Conservatives remain very weak across a large number of councils. They exceeded 30% of votes in only three (South Ayrshire, East Renfrewshire and Dumfries and Galloway) while failing to reach 10% of the vote in ten. In two councils (Glasgow and West Dunbartonshire) they polled fewer votes than the SSP. In contrast, despite an overall decline Labour is weak only in rural and peripheral areas and remains the dominant party in the central belt, having most votes in 15 of the 20 councils in that area. Significant cracks in the Labour monolith appeared in 2003, however. The party was beaten into second place in Aberdeen by the Liberal Democrats, tied with the SNP in Dundee and, perhaps most surprising of all, was trounced by the Liberal Democrats in Inverclyde. Support for the Liberal Democrats themselves, is highly variable. In some areas they are an irrelevance. They had no candidates and therefore no votes in three councils and had less than 10% of the votes in another eleven. On the other hand, they were the leading party in Aberdeen, Aberdeenshire, East Dunbartonshire and Inverclyde and came second in Edinburgh and Fife. The SNP have rather more consistent support across Scotland – only in East Renfrewshire and Scottish Borders could they be considered an irrelevance – but were the largest party in only three councils – Angus, Perth and Kinross and Renfrewshire. Finally, it is worth noting the cross-council variations in support for the SSP. The SSP's largest share of the vote was in Glasgow (15.6%) but also reached double figures in West Dunbartonshire (10.1%). In many other councils, however, the party barely registered.

Despite changes in the level of support for the parties from 1999 to 2003, the relative strength of the parties across authorities was very similar in both sets of elections. Correlating the parties' vote shares at council level in 1999 and 2003 gives coefficients of 0.918 for the Conservatives, 0.985 for Labour, 0.961 for the Liberal Democrats and 0.952 for the SNP. These indicate very strong relationships and show that there was strong continuity in the geography of party support. Almost all of the councils in which a party performed unexpectedly well or badly on the basis of its 1999 showing can be explained in terms of changes in candidatures. This is what explains, for example, the fact that the Conservatives had an exceptionally good performance relative to 1999 in Dumfries and Galloway and an exceptionally bad one in Angus. There are a few exceptions which are worth noting, however. The Liberal Democrats performed better than would be expected and both Labour and the Conservatives worse in Aberdeen. The SNP's best performance was in Renfrewshire but appears to have suffered badly at the hands of the SSP in West Dunbartonshire and Glasgow.

The impact of the SSP is one of the key questions of the council and Scottish Parliament elections in 2003. Put simply, did the SSP do more harm to Labour or the SNP? Analysing ward results can shed some light on this issue and Table G presents some relevant data. Taking the 277 wards which all four major parties contested in both 1999 and 2003 we can split them according to whether or not there was also an SSP candidate in 2003 and compare changes in the shares of vote obtained.

Table G
Changes in Shares of Votes in Wards Contested by All Four Major Parties 1999-2003

	No SSP Candidate in 2003	SSP Candidate in 2003
Conservative	+1.5	-0.1
Labour	-3.0	-5.6
Liberal Democrats	+4.9	+2.6
SNP	-1.6	-5.3
SSP	0.0	+7.3
(N)	(172)	(105)

Unsurprisingly, the performance of the Conservatives was hardly affected by the presence or otherwise of an SSP candidate. The Liberal Democrats improved in both cases but not by as much where there was an SSP candidate. This suggests that that where there was no SSP candidate the Liberal Democrats may have benefitted from an anti Labour/SNP vote which would otherwise have gone to the SSP. Labour declined more where there was an SSP candidate than in wards not contested by the SSP but the SNP appears to have suffered most from the success of the SSP. The SNP's vote share dropped by 1.6 points where there was no SSP candidate but by 5.3 points where there was one. The conclusion suggested by this simple analysis is confirmed if we correlate change in SSP share of the vote with change in the share obtained by the major parties in all 277 wards contested by all four in both 1999 and 2003. For the Liberal Democrats and Labour the coefficients obtained are statistically significant at -0.112 and -0.165 respectively, indicating that their losses were related to SSP gains. For the SNP the coefficient is -0.338, which indicates a considerably stronger and more significant relationship. The conclusion is that it was the SNP that suffered most from the SSP's incursion into the elections. This conclusion is confirmed if we repeat the analysis for wards contested by the Conservatives, Labour and SNP in both elections – in this case only change in SNP vote has a significant relationship with change in SSP support. A similar analysis at constituency level using the results of the Scottish Parliament election also suggests that it was the SNP that suffered most from the advance made by the SSP.

To many people, what matters most in local elections is winning seats. That, rather than ups and downs in the shares of the votes, is what determines who controls the local council and acquires the powers that accrue from such control. Table H shows the total number of seats won by each of the parties in the three elections since 1995. (Summary table 11 shows the number won in 2003 in individual authorities.) Despite a significant fall in voting support, Labour retains the lion's share of Scottish council seats although the party has more than 100 fewer councillors than it had in 1995, when it was in opposition at Westminster. The SNP also fell back but the Conservatives and Liberal Democrats made gains, as did Independents. The SSP gained a second councillor (in West Dunbartonshire).

The turnover of seats between 1999 and 2003 in mainland councils is shown in Table I. The great majority of seats, of course, did not change hands but there was, nonetheless, a good deal of turnover. The Conservative lost 12 wards to the Liberal Democrats but made 27 gains, including 12 from Independents. Labour gained 25 wards, mainly from the SNP, but lost 65 while the Liberal Democrat gains (44) – mainly at the expense of the Conservatives and Labour – were precisely double their losses, most of which were to Independents. The SNP made some gains from Labour but lost 19 wards to Labour and 17 to Independents. Independents themselves made significant net gains from Labour, the Liberal Democrats and the SNP but, interestingly made none from, and lost 12 to, the Conservatives.

At council level the greatest instability was seen in Scottish Borders where 20 of the 34 wards changed hands but over 30% of wards changed in Aberdeen, Dundee and Inverclyde. At the other extreme no wards changed hands in Renfrewshire, only 2 of 70 in North Lanarkshire and 3 of 79 in Glasgow. Looking at the fortunes of the major parties across the councils, the Conservatives did best in Borders (9 gains) and Aberdeenshire (5 gains and 1 loss). A bright spot for Labour was East Ayrshire (7 gains and 1 loss) but they had net losses of 8 in Aberdeen, 7 in Fife, 5 in Inverclyde and 4 in both North Ayrshire and Dundee. The Liberal Democrats had a net loss of 6 in Scottish Borders but a net gain of 8 in Aberdeen and 5 in Inverclyde. Aberdeen was good for the SNP with 3 gains and no losses but 7 wards were lost (and one gained) in East Ayrshire, 5 in Aberdeenshire and 4 in both Angus and West Dunbartonshire.

How did the 2003 elections affect the political map of Scotland in terms of party control of the councils? On the basis of the election results the following indicates the situation in each council (figures in brackets show the change as compared with 1995):

Majority Labour Control (-2)

Clackmannanshire	Midlothian	Stirling
East Ayrshire	North Ayrshire	West Dunbartonshire
East Lothian	North Lanarkshire	West Lothian
Edinburgh	Renfrewshire
Glasgow	South Lanarkshire

Majority Liberal Democrat Control (+1)

Inverclyde

Majority SNP Control (0)

Angus

Majority Independent Control (0)

Argyll and Bute
Highland
Moray

No Overall Control (Largest party/ies in brackets) (+1)

Aberdeen (Lib Dem)	Falkirk (Lab)
Aberdeenshire (Lib Dem)	Fife (Lab)
Dundee (SNP)	Perthshire and Kinross (SNP)
Dumfries and Galloway (Lab)	Scottish Borders (Ind)
East Dunbartonshire (Lib Dem)	South Ayrshire (Con/Lab)
East Renfrewshire (Lab)

Despite their generally weaker performance, Labour actually won control of two councils – Clackmannanshire and Stirling (both from no overall control). On the other hand they lost 3 to no overall control – Aberdeen, Fife and South Ayrshire – and one to the Liberal Democrats (Inverclyde) who thereby gained outright control of a new Scottish council for the first time. The Conservatives have yet to win control of a council although they came very close in South Ayrshire, where both they and Labour have 15 seats apiece (Labour taking control after cutting cards). Apart from the councils mentioned, there were no other changes in control although the relative positions of the parties changed in a number where no one party has a majority.

Labour's domination of local government in Scotland is much less complete than it used to be. The party now controls just 13 councils – although these contain about 53% of the Scottish electorate. There are now 11 councils, with about 36% of the total electorate, in which no party has an overall majority of seats. For a significant minority of authorities and of electors, therefore, 'hung' councils, with their attendant problems and opportunities, have become a normal state of affairs.

Conclusion

The 2003 Scottish local elections could well be the last to be held using the first-past-the-post electoral system. Following the Scottish Parliament elections, a new agreement between the ruling coalition partners, Labour and the Liberal Democrats, included a commitment to proceed with the introduction of a more proportional system. The consequences of such a change would be far reaching. It would also be an act of remarkable political selflessness. If we compare seats actually won in the mainland councils in 2003 with the seats that would have been won in each authority if the system were broadly proportional, then both the coalition parties would be losers. Labour would have won 152 fewer seats and the Liberal Democrats 10 fewer. Independents would also have declined (by 14). The Conservatives would have won 48 more seats, the SSP 25 more and the SNP 103 more. Only one council (North Lanarkshire) would have a single party with overall control. It is little wonder that the introduction of proportional representation at local level is bitterly opposed by many leading Labour councillors.

It may be that the introduction of a proportional system would, as proponents suggest, blow a breath of fresh air through the musty corridors of Scottish local government. If the local elections are held on the same day as the next Parliament elections in 2007, however, the task facing voters will be extremely complex. We tend to the view taken by the Welsh Assembly and the Scottish Politics website mentioned in the Preface – that it would be better to separate the two sets of elections. This would make things a little easier for voters, although it might result in lower local turnouts. Importantly, however, it would allow local elections to fulfill more clearly their primary function – to allow local voters to pass judgement upon the quality of their local representatives and hold their local administration accountable.

A Note on the Islands Councils

Between 1974 and 1995 there was a two-tier structure of local government - Regions and Districts - in mainland Scotland. The special circumstances of the Northern and Western Isles meant that such a structure was not appropriate, however, and three unitary Islands Councils - Orkney, Shetland and Western Isles - were created. Since these were already in place, there was no need for special elections to be held in 1995 when the new mainland unitary authorities were first elected. In 1999 and 2002 the islands re-integrated into the normal election cycle and table J provides a summary of the results.

From their inception the Islands councils have been dominated by Independents and this has continued. As before, Independents comprised the vast majority of candidates in 2003, took 80% of the votes and more than 80% of the seats. There were no party candidates at all in Orkney, but the Liberal Democrats made a showing in Shetland with 13 candidates. The 8 Labour and 6 SNP candidates were all in Comhairle nan Eilean Siar. Typical of areas in which non-partisan local politics is the rule, a large proportion (43%) of wards went uncontested in the islands. Even in the few mainland councils where Independents predominate, parties nonetheless play a significant part in elections. This is less true of the islands which remain bastions of non-partisan local politics.
